Excerpt: .opinion, said Herr Siichier, commencing to speak, delighted that as his father-in-law had laughed, he likewise need no longer impose any restraint on himself in this respect. There is never any harm in what we say at table in joke; and thereupon he burst out into so hearty a laugh, that the glass trembled in his hand. Siichier! Siichier! exclaimed his wife. But the former was now in his happiest mood. Do you object to my liking the colonel? he said. Perhaps you re jealous. You ought to be so, replied the lady, pursing up her pretty lips with an air of defiance. Suppose I were to tell you that I am going to invite him to become a visitor at our house, for the future. And what would you say if I told you that I had already asked him? The colonel sat between the two, as if in Abraham s bosom. Bertha has already invited me, said he, wiping his moustache with a napkin, and I have accepted. It betokened, in fact, the second and higher grade of his friendship when he called ladies not only by their Christian names, but also without any of the customary prefixes of madame or miss. Bertha! cried Herr Siichier, with another of those outbursts of laughter which made his wife so uneasy; Bertha! he calls her Bertha. That is good, excellent. In the meantime, Herr Grandidier, with his eyes cast down, and indifferent as to...
