Here and there it appears also to carry some iron and approach siderite in composition. Because of their common occurrence in the ore, two other minerals must be regarded as gangue minerals, namely, chlorite and sericite, 6 though both of these, as well as a part of the quartz, were not formed entirely from the minerals carried in the ore-bearing solutions, but were produced by the interaction of these solutions and mineral components of the alaskite porphyry. The chlorite was derived from the basic silicate minerals of the alaskite porphyry, and the sericite was formed from the feldspars of the porphyry chiefly through the solution of soda and the deposition of potash in place of it. Bodies of gypsum, the hydrated sulphate of calcium, are found associated with pyrite and a little chalcopyrite in deep levels of the Bully Hill and Rising Star mines. Microscopic examination of specimens of this gypsum shows that it contains cores of anhydrite, the anhydrous calcium sulphate. Anhydrite was undoubtedly the primary mineral in this region wherever gypsum has been found, and was probably formed under conditions similar to those which permitted the development of the similarly constituted barium sulphate (barite), which is present in much greater quantity. Extremely minute shreds of material found in the ore of many deposits are believed to represent one and possibly two other minerals, though as yet their identity has not been ascertained. Loo. oit. 6 Possibly paragonite in part. See footnote on p. 20...
