They met silently, and in tears; a brother and a sister who had never known each other! Little did either of them know the state of their own feelings. It was the kindling of a new and strange passion; they could not, nor did they care to analyze it. Her mother watched them with deep and difficultly restrained emotion. She saw the deep love that had sprung up in their breasts for each other. She longed to undeceive them; but her insight into their natures and character led her to believe that the foundation of the affection they mutually exhibited towards each other was laid in sympathies deeper than those of simple consanguinity. She then thought of her own early frailties, and when she considered what a safeguard, what a shield the feeling of so near a relationship would...
