Every generator must be protected by a safety device from excessive current; a fuse or an automatic circuit breaker being necessary in the main circuit between the generator and bus-bars. Armatures must be kept dry. Never put the full load on any dynamo or motor after it;has laid idle for a length of time without first running it on a light load or baking the armature in an oven. For drying out a small generator or motor, a bank of lamps in series with the machine is useful; enough lamps should be used to barely warm the windings, starting with a few and gradually increasing the number. Removing Armature.--If it becomes necessary to remove an armature, sling, or move it by the shaft; never allow any strain to be put on the windings, or commutator. Set it down on blocks under each end of shaft, so the face of wound surface clears floor. An armature should not vibrate when running, and should clear the pole pieces by at least one-eighth of an inch. A little end play must be allowed so that armature can move a trifle in and out of field. The field circuit of a motor or dynamo must never be opened while running, or the high electromotive force induced in the field magnet coils by the sudden break of...
