Excerpt: . . . begged they would not distress themselves; a soldier should not mind such trifles, and he had no doubt he should be very well accommodated at the inn. The bell was now rung, and Con Lyne appeared, who was ordered to show our hero the way to Bosten Town, where he was to sleep. . . . And mind, Con, said his master, let Mr. Butler have what linen he wants out of my dressing room. Perhaps you will accommodate me with a razor, said the cornet, apologizing to the lady in his best manner, for talking of such things in her presence. Oh, certainly--any thing you require; but stop--really I fear I have not one to offer you; I believe, my dear, you sent them all to be ground yesterday. This was too much for the cornets risible faculties, who now laughed outright...
